

Cañada College Fashion Department Debuts New Methods of Online Teaching and Learning

The Pandemic has changed the classroom for Fall instruction and the Fashion Department at Cañada College is excited about its new method of teaching online. In preparation for the new semester, the Fashion Department Professors have participated in a series of trainings to prime their courses for a fun, innovative and meaningful online learning experience.

The very successful Cañada College Fashion Program has prepared students for employment in the international apparel industry; they have worked in England, Belgium, India, Brazil and other countries. Former students are working for Calvin Klein Menswear and McCall's Pattern Company. Former students have transferred to several universities throughout the state and country as well as to prestigious fashion schools such as the Fashion Institute of Technology, Parsons, and St. Martins in London. However, students enroll in Cañada College's Fashion Program for a variety of reasons, especially to learn new skills.

Since students and teachers will not physically be on campus, the Fashion Department has worked with the Cañada Bookstore to prepare one-stop-shopping for many of the Fashion classes. Class supplies will be packaged and available for curbside pick-up or mailed directly to the students.

Now is the time to take an enriching class from the comfort of your own home. Refresh your skills and learn new sewing and pattern making techniques! You don't have to commute or buy gas for your car. Grab a friend or neighbor to share the learning experience and enjoy this new adventure together. We look forward to seeing you online – safe and healthy.
